George Rickey reimagined the use of motors to power his sculptures and used the rectangular panels—also called to capture the wind. When the wind decreases, gravity begins to exert its pull over the sculpture. The exact movements of the sculpture are impossible to predict. Four-Rectangle Oblique is a study in suspension—the rectangular forms are steady and orderly while the movement, activated by the wind and gravitational pull, is complex and spontaneous.

To create this work, Julian Opie begins with a video of two people walking. Using computer software, the artist animates each of the 205 frames in the original video but retains the audios and movements. He makes drawings of the figures at regular intervals. He joins these drawings together to produce figures that move with the fluidity of real human beings. The drawings are translated into a format that can be played on the LED panels to create a continuous animation. The heads of these figures are simple circles. Since they appear to be anonymous and identical, we might be tempted to regard them as symbols for every man and woman. But the title Opie gives them references specific—Kunst and Julie.
